(From an article by Edwin Granberry)

... There are not many 'Randall Made' knives. Somewhere in London an air-raid warden carries one of them at his belt; two others are somewhere in England. One is in the possession of an Alaskan bear hunter, and a Canadian guide uses a No. 19 for skinning beavers. A fourth is with an army major in Greenland. Here and there, one will be found, usually at some adventurous outpost of the world. Not many of them, however, will ever be found, for they are designed and created by the hand of a single individual. Each one of them comes into being as a separate entity, requiring hours of pains-taking labor from the erect, dark, hazel-eyed young Scotsman who makes them as a hobby. Sportsman himself, he is able, by some Merlin-like legerdemain, to infuse into this implement of the sportsman the lure of the woods and waters. It is impossible to handle one of these knives without hearing the slap of waves against a birch canoe, without smelling the balsam smoke of a campfire.

'But a knife, it would seem, is just a knife. Yet when a hand-made article has lavished on it the skill and imagination such as was produced by the Italian crafts-men in metals in the 16th Century, that article becomes a work of art. And such an article is each one of these Randall knives.'

'They are first of all, to be sure, practical, highly specialized cutting instruments, diamond hard, masculine as a stag. But into their aggressive sturdiness has been forged a beauty — achieved by subtlety of blade line as well as a mosaic-like treatment of handle inserts — which stamps them as collectors' items. And into collections many of them are likely to go some day, as illustrations of an art that has not been practiced with more imagination since the days of chivalry, when a man wore his side arms as a badge of his rank.'

Please allow 10 days for shipment. Will ship either C. O. D. or in receipt of check or money order.

When ordering, please give style number, blade length and type of handle, (whether large, medium or small grip). Inlaid initials, or initials engraved on silver disks on butt of handles at slight additional cost.
